Endoscopic transsphenoidal approach for the management of pituitary adenomas originating from the intrapetrous carotid artery. To explore the feasibility and efficacy of endoscopic transsphenoidal approach for tumors originating from the intrapetrous carotid artery, in order to improve the management of these tumors. Ten patients who underwent endoscopic transsphenoidal surgery for intrapetrous carotid artery anterior petrous meningiomas were reviewed in the present study. All the patients except one received preoperative embolization. Their presenting symptoms, tumor characteristics, surgical details, and follow-up outcomes were retrospectively analyzed. The mean age of these patients was 40.2 years. Most of them (80%) were female, and all patients (100%) were devoid of visual field deficit. In 8 patients, the gross total resection was achieved without inducing significant surgical morbidity. In 2 patients, the resection was subtotal due to the involvement of the anterior communicating artery, one of whom underwent extended transsphenoidal approach. A perioperative rebleeding occurred in 1 patient who received the aggressive resection. The postoperative follow-up period was 6 to 40 months, in which the favorable outcomes (visual function intact with no tumor-related clinical symptoms) were achieved in all patients. The intrapetrous carotid artery anterior petrous meningiomas is a rare but critical tumor that does not commonly harbor parenchymal extension. Intraoperative blood loss during the surgery of this particular tumor is usually substantial. Complete and subt
